This collection of essays about the author's adventures in Appalachia was a delight to read. It's the perfect book to curl up with in front of a crackling fire, or the ideal read while sitting in a rocking chair on your own front porch. This book is about the simple joys of family, friends, homemade melt-in-your-mouth food, nature, and community. These heartwarming (and sometimes humorous) tales left me with a feeling of gratitude for what is truly important in life--home and hearth.

A Wild Cajun Woman learns to live in the rural forested Appalachian Mountains of Southeast Tennessee. In this book, meet the folks and foods that make this House in the Holler her and her husbands home.

About the Author
A native of New Orleans whose sense of adventure far exceeds her common sense, but is willing to learn anything. Two kids, two divorces, her husband's heart transplant, Hurricane Katrina, and four grandchildren have convinced her that "Life is what happens when you're making other plans." But still she plans... Currently resides with her husband in Coker Creek, Tennessee in the Cherokee National Forest, when she's not at some celebration in New Orleans.
